Religion, State & Society is a peer-reviewed journal and is the only English-language academic publication devoted to these issues in communist and formerly communist countries throughout the world, and focusing on the legacy of the encounter between religion and communism. What problems are these religious communities now facing in their own countries and in a rapidly changing world? How much contact and cooperation is there between religious communities of East and West? Where are the areas of misunderstanding and conflict? Religious believers in Europe, Asia and the rest of the world have much to learn from the way in which their counterparts in communist and formerly communist countries are tackling social, cultural, ethnic, political and ecclesiastical problems, and vice versa.

Contributions are welcome from scholars in all disciplines and from people involved in the work of religious organisations and in the field of relations between religion and the state. Articles may address any issue, historical or contemporary, within the journal's field of reference. The journal encourages debate within the pages of a single issue and in the form of responses to articles which have appeared in earlier issues. Articles of up to 7000 words are invited. Longer contributions will also be considered. Please send manuscripts (hard copy or e-mail) to the Editor: Dr Philip Walters, Religion, State & Society, Keston Institute, 38 St Aldates, Oxford OX1 1BN, UK; e-mail: philip.walters@keston.org
